

Refunding Costs if an Athlete Is Unable to Participate

The costs of participating in team sports have skyrocketed. The Sports Tuition Expense Protection (STEP) program can help.

In most cases, the teams and leagues rely on pre-paid, nonrefundable tuition and fees to support their own significant budgets and pay for coaches, referees, facility rentals, insurance and more.

But what happens when an athlete can't participate due to injury or sickness or the relocation of the family due to a job change? Families remain on the hook for related costs, which can adversely affect their experience with youth sports and create additional pressure as their child recovers.

“A family’s financial obligations don’t go away when a child suffers an injury and has to sit out. STEP provides some peace of mind for families, removes any pressure to rush an athlete back into action before they’re ready, and ensures clubs continue to have funds for coaches, facilities and events.”

The STEP program is an innovative offering that:

- Provides peace of mind for families as they make a significant investment
- Removes any pressure to rush an athlete back into action before they're ready
- Ensures clubs continue to have funds for coaches, facilities and events

STEP coverage is offered on a group basis, but there is flexibility in how it can be implemented. The sports organization can purchase it for all participants, or it can be offered on an optional basis to the participants with a minimal commitment from the organization. Across a variety of scenarios, STEP offers great protection at an affordable price.

“Having STEP in place provides some protection for the unexpected and supports positive experiences that make ongoing participation possible.”
